Ford Motor Company was in the process of consolidating its North American workplace dining operations, with Aramark as the sole provider, when it hit the pandemic speed bump. Most office workers began working offsite, while manufacturing facilities either shut down or rapidly retooled to make critical supplies like ventilators and masks.

As highlighted in this Food Management article, Aramark quickly shifted into gear to meet our client's changing needs. And as essential workers began returning to commercial sites, we introduced an online order box lunch program, supplemented in pilot locations by micro markets.

Until it's clear that traditional workplace cafés can be safely reopened, Ford global sense in this world than to have people line up. In the manufacturing world, it gets to be especially challenging because the worker has 26 minutes to get their food, eat it, and get back to the line and so time is of the essence.”
